As an adjunct to studies of the mechanisms by which the skeleton develops, a cell culture system for skeletal tissues is needed. A method for growing an osteoblastic cell line in a novel, 3D bone-forming matrix is described. The novel bone-forming matrix, a reconstituted fibrin gel, provides a solid environment conducive to attachment, growth, and differentiation of MC3T3-E1 osteoblastic cells. In addition to forming cells on the surface of the matrix, osteoblast growth was observed in the fibrin gel itself. Based upon data from immunocytochemistry, quantitative reverse transcriptase-polymerase chain reaction, and in situ hybridization, genes previously shown to be expressed in bone-forming cells in vivo were expressed in similar patterns in bone cell cultures. Other unique characteristics of osteoblasts in this system include an alkaline phosphatase-positive phenotype, accumulation of type I collagen in the extracellular matrix, and secretory function. Importantly, in response to osteogenic growth factor treatment, MC3T3-E1 cells in the fibrin gel had increased alkaline phosphatase activity, mineralized type I collagen fibrils, and increased proliferative capacity. These findings support the use of the novel cell culture system as a research tool for the study of bone.Tuesday, February 26, 2012 SCAM ALERT: Several WRSM Bloggers received a message that was presumably sent by Paul Becker, CEO of Europe based insolvency company, Companies of Mergers and Acquisitions (CMAs). In the message, Paul suggests several bloggers for a "Welcome to the WRSM" blogpost here: We are contacting you to inquire about the possibility of doing an article for the World Resilience Summit to be held in May 2012 in Amsterdam. We are working on several solutions for the Summit and would like to invite you to be a part of the call at 11:00 CET, 26 February 2012, when we can discuss the topic with you. You may rest assured that you will be participating on one way or the other. Monday, February 18, 2012 I was wondering if you would
